panorama

ing itself from civilian affairs will most likely continue.

However, this does not mean that Pakistan's Armed Forces arewilling to transform into something which Samuel

Huntington once described as a "politically sterile and neutral agent" of the (civilian)government.The political development is still far from being a sustainable process

Despitepositive trends especially the signs of a new pro-democratization.

of

panorama panorama panorama panorama panorama panorama panorama panorama panorama panorama

(FATA).The fact that the Pakistani military recentlyannounced a 'New Military Doctrine' which identifies

India not as the major enemy anymore and point to domestic militant extremist forces especially Tehrik-e-Taliban

Pakistan (TTP), the anti-Shia

Lashkar-e-Jhangvi (LEJ) and the Baloch nationalist elements as the new dominating threat. This can be seen as an indicator for the severity of the internal security situa-

Semblance of civilian control? Military, elections and the latest coup conspiracy in Pakistan

14

DR. SIEGFRIED 0. WOLF

GENERALLY,

PAKISTAN IS CONSIDERED BY MOST OBSERVERS AS A CLASSIC EXAMPLE OF A PRAETORIAN STATE IN WHICH THE MILITARY PERCEIVES ITSELF AS THE SOLE GUARDIAN OF THE COUNTRY'S NATIONAL SOVEREIGNTY AND MORAL INTEGRITY, THE CHIEF INITIATOR OF THE NATIONAL AGENDA AND THE MAJOR ARBITER OF CONFLICT BETWEEN SOCIAL AND POLITICAL FORCES

enerally, Pakistan is ed politics whichsubseconsidered by most quently lead to a consolida-Jobservers as a classic tion of democracy. They are example of a praetorian state, convinced that thebasic in which the military perdeterminants which were ceives itself as the sole responsible for military guardian of the country's takeovers in the past did not national sovereignty and moral integrity, the chief ini-tiator of the national agenda change fundamentally.Protagonists of this viewpointproclaim that one has and the major arbiter of conto expect once again a 'visiflict between social and politble intervention' by forces ical forces. Over time, the which are not in favour of a armed forces became so democratic transfer of power deeply and widely entrenched (from one civilian government to another one), which in all spheres of the Pakistani state that today they are not would be the first time in the dependant on any formal precountry's troubled political transition. This debate gained rogatives to exercise influence over all significant decisionfurther momentum through making processes or to secure S e n a t o r RazaRabbaniwhichwarned their corporate interests. It can be stated that Pakistan about potential attempts of until today has never experiinitiating a political roll back by undermining the constienced the best case scenario of civil-military relations which is generally described tutional and political achievements of the current governas 'civilian supremacy'. In conment. He even went a 'dramatic step' further by raising sequence, since its existence, his serious concerns about the state oscillated between various types of military the potential threat of the rulers, elected political establishment of an extraconstitutional caretaker govauthoritarianism and some democratic intermezzos. ernment in order to derail the Concretely, the military either upcoming elections. Being one of the main architects of took over directly or tried to make sure that a compliant the 18th Amendment, a concivilian government was in stitutional endeavor which power, accepting the domican be interpreted as an nance of the military in all sigexpression of the political will nificant policy fields. This by civilians to strengthen their happened either through position towards the military, threatening and/or conwas seriously disturbing the straining an already elected enthusiasm regarding demogovernment or via interfering with the political party sphere cratic prospects. This series of alarm signals seemed even more plausible in the context in general and the electoral process in particular. In both of the sudden appearance of cases, the military applied all the influential cleric forms of influence, under-Muhammad Tahir-ulmining any substantial devel-Qadriwho demanded that the opment of democratic culcurrent government should ture, norms and procedures. step down before the end of Enforcing break-ups and/or the term in favor of an extrareshaping existing parties to constitutional caretaker govcreate pro-military parties ernment of technocrats which should have the support of which were later used as 'political proxies', organizing non-electoral institutions, parties in opposition, initiatnamely the Supreme Court ing vote(s) of confidence and and the military. party defections (horse trad-

However, it is argued here that these pessimistic scenarios only partly reflect the political realities in current Pakistan. But before one should subsume such concerns as mentioned above under the category of 'traditional Pakistani conspiracy theories' one should take following phenomena and observations into consideration. First of all there is a clear tion in the country's political trend towards a general Having this trajectory in improvement of civil-military mind, the question which relations. In this context one appears today is - are the last can state that in recent years, five years also just a brief some fundamental cornerintermezzo of an elected govstones for the future compoernment or does the military sition of civil-military relatop brass once again find it tions were put in place which necessary to take 'more forcould change the trajectory mally' matters into their own of civil-military relations in hands? In this context, sever-Pakistan. Indications that the al observers are claiming that relationship between the civil-Pakistan is not on the eve of ian leadership and military a critical juncture which will echelons in the country break the patterns of the tramoved from extraordinary ditionally military - dominatconfrontation towards an

ing) in order to destabilise governments, monitoring and harassing politicians to keep them in check, manipulating election timing, malfeasance and fraud during the election campaign as well as rigging the actual ballots, were just some elements of the 'extra-constitutional tool box' used by the armed forces to entrench the military's posiarena.

increasing degree of cooperation are very promising. This finds its most visible expression in the re-introduction of making policy by regular, mutual consultation which is reflected by an increase in meetings between soldiers and politicians as well as briefings and hearings with military's top brass in the parliament. This was made possible by a growing conviction that thedeeply entrenched confrontational attitude between civilians and soldiers must be avoided to stabilize the political situation. Therefore, free and fair elections are accepted as a sine quo non from both sides.

Second, the military is too preoccupied with its 'double burden. The involvement in several internal security missions through the whole country forced the supreme command to be active on 'two fronts'. On one side the armed forces have to carry out unconventional anti-secessionist and counter-terrorists activities.On the other side. they want to be able to deal with India in a conventional manner. Being aware of this, several Pakistani based militant groups have been carrying out terrorist acts against India like the 2008 Mumbai attackto undermine the normalization of ties between Islamabad and New Delhi. The rationale behind it is to provoke Indian troop concentration at the frontier with its hostile neighbour to force Pakistan's military to keep its attention on this border as well. The overall aim of the terrorists is to compel the army to maintain its force level at the easternflank in order to create room to manoeuvre for other/affiliated terrorists groups operating in areas located in western parts of Pakistan like the Federal Administered Tribal Areas tion in Pakistan. To sum up, the military has no room to manoeuvre.Subsequently they have no interest or free capacities to stage another coup d'état. Third, the militarytop brass is confronted with the additional tasks of maintaining internal coherence.Not because of a remarkable factionalism or a disruption of the chain of command and discipline but more in the form of a social transformation of the armed forces.Officers and rank and files have to deal with major shifts in the recruitment patterns which are marked by ethnic-cultural and socioeconomic features. The need for the reduction of Puniabi dominance as well as a change from upper-middle class to the lower middle class which are predominantly from urban than rural areas as recruiting base is striking. Besidesthis 'social change', the cohesiveness is further challenged by frustration over the ambiguous performance of the armed forces during the last decade of counterterrorist activities. Furthermore, there is aperception among soldiers that this war lacks public support among the Pakistani people and furthermore, efforts and losses are not recognized by the international community which is seen as a root cause for their involvement.On top of this, there are certain indicators that the armed forces, especially the Army and paramilitary units, are increasingly confronted with Islamist elements from within. Several successful high profile terrorist attacks on facilities and personnel of the Pakistan Armed Forces were only possible with support from insiders which must be seen as proof for a worrying degree of infiltration by Islamists. Having this in mind and being aware that all martial law administration has proven to be extremely harmful to the armed forces as an institution, the military leadershiphas not only undertaken a new assessment of the internal security situation but has also tried to enhance political ownership. In other words, the armed forces are attempting to gain political support and legitimacy from the elected government in order to enhance their opportunities in managing the cohesiveness and order of its personal. Fourth.in last the decadesPakistanhas experienced a consolidation of constitutional power as a countervailing force against formal military intervention into politics. This is can be contributed to several factors. Besides a (colonially) inherited belief in constitutional documents as a sole source of political legitimacy, the 1973 Constitution is the only document of national consensus (nottaking amend-

into

ments

account).Additionally, there is a phenomenon which can be described as thecultivation of a certain 'constitutional loyalty' by military rulers. This created a constitutional culture, which especially drew the latest military ruler Pervez Musharraf into a 'circulusdiaboli'. Within its search for political-constitutional legitimacy for its extra-constitutional leadership, he was forced to carry out various measures of constitutional engineering. In consequence, he not only accepted the supremacy of the constitution but also made himself dependent on the support of the judiciary. Therefore, one can state that Pakistan has significant constitutional power. Even if this does not mean that the constitution is strong enough to avoid a priori any future military coup. However, the constitution has restricted the army and will contribute to the regulation of civil-military relations as well as to the establishment of civilian control. In this context, the armed forces made the experience that they cannot rule without being kept at bay by the constitution and as a result are losing public support as well as the image as the guardian of the state.

Therefore, measures such as the 18th Amendment and the appearance of a strong new judiciary represented by the Supreme Court, as an independent actor will contribute towards the strengthening of constitutional culture and power.

Fifth, there is immanent change of external factors. Basically it seems that the international community is willing-unlike in the past- to take on a more responsible role when it comes to civilmilitary relations in Pakistan. Above all, the US as the most significant partner established its bilateral relations with the country primarily on military-to-military contacts from the 1950s onwards. This seriously compromised the weak civilian governments which had to start with extremely limited resources and had to deal with the tremendous challenge of postcolonial statebuilding. In consequence, the US contributed to wane the instable oversight of the growing armed forces and intelligence services instead of strengthening civilian institutions. In brief, Pakistan's security apparatus was empowered at the expense of the country's democratic future.Today, increasing efforts are made to intensify civil-to-civil contactsbetween US and Pakistan governments as well as to support cooperation between civilians and the military. Additionally the EU is starting to play a crucial role in the improvement of the relations between politicians and military top brass by initiating projects of enhancing the quality of governance and strengthening democratic processes. However, external actors have to take the sensitivity of Pakistan's establishment and people regarding foreign influence carefully into account. Experiencing regular drone-attacks, unauthorized foreign military and intelligence operations on its own soil (killing of Osama Bin Laden in Abbottabad by US special forces or the Raymond Allen Davis incident, when a CIA contractor killed several Pakistani intelligence operatives) as well as the 'Memogate affair' did not only deteriorate US-Pakistan relations but might also rupture the opportunity to act as an 'broker' of the new fragile civil-military rapprochement. But despite the fact that antiwestern feelings are at the peak, there is awareness among the military leadership as well as the civilians that the 'global environment' is not in favour of military rule or some kind of civil-military hybrids anymore and that they have to face strict consequences by the donors.

To sum up, it appears that the process in which the military is increasingly separatfessionalism' among politicians and political parties as well as the growing cheekiness of the judiciary when it comes to keeping soldiers in checkregardingextra-constitutional manoeuvres -there are no reasons to drop the notion of Pakistan as a 'failed democracy'. Taking the high political sensitivity of the military top brass and their habits of 'commenting' activities of civilians into account, it seems that it will still remain a feature of Pakistani politics that soldiers will not accept any civil-military scenario in which they have no political role. Undoubtedly the armed forces will continue as the major stakeholder in the political power structure.As a result, the soldier's informal influence in decision-making will very likely remain the norm rather than an exception. But the military knows about its own limitations and is alsoaware that Pakistan is in a very challenging situationwhich goes beyond the 'traditional existential threats' which the country has been facing since its existence. The country is confronted with major socio-economic problems, it is heavily dependent on foreign resources and it is experiencing its most challenging internal security situation in which Islamabad is not only confronted with militant sub-nationalisms but also with increasingly fundamentalist elements which are turning against the Pakistani state, its former principal.Furthermore sectarianism is at its peak which leads to a culture of violence which raises serious concerns about the democratic governability of the country. In such a situation, the soldiersseem to understand that neither the country nor the armed forces can withstand another coup. Rewriting civil-military relations and the continuation of the 'de-militarized' electoral process of 2008 are possible. Therefore it appears quite promising that the current government is more than just another democratic interlude

The writer is a lecturer of Political Science and International Relations as well as a senior research fellow in the Department of Political Science, South Asia Institute Heidelberg University in Pakistan's history.